INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

Statements showing the results of the first elections to the Indian Legislature and the Provincial Legislative Councils constituted by the Government of India Act, 1919.

The accompanying statements represent a Return moved for in December last in the House of Lords, which, however, in response to similar requests made subsequently in the House of Commons, it has been decided to present to both Houses of Parliament.

The statutory rules which form the basis of the composition of the two Chambers of the Indian Legislature and of the eight provincial Councils affected by the Act, and which settled the qualifications of electors and candidates and demarcated constituencies, were approved by both Houses of Parliament in July 1920. The elections were held on various dates in November and December and were completed in the latter month. The statistics were accompanied by reports from the Local Governments, but these are for the most part of considerable length, and deal with a large mass of technical detail which is not of sufficient public interest to justify their publication in full. It may, however, add to the value of the returns if a brief summary is given of their more salient features in the light of the Local Governments' reports.

(i) Candidature.

Taking the 10 Legislative bodies collectively (two Chambers of the Indian Legislature and eight provincial Councils) there were 774 seats to be filled by election, and 1,957 candidates stood for these. There were contested elections for 535 of the 774 seats, and for these 535 seats 1,718 candidates were forthcoming—an average of over three per seat, though in some constituencies as many as 12 candidates stood for one seat, and in one constituency in the United Provinces 16 candidates were nominated. For only about half a dozen of the 774 seats was there no candidate nominated in the first instance, and all of these have since been filled by bye-elections. The "summary statements" which have been added to the detailed figures in order to present them in a shorter form, show at a glance the number of candidates and the number of uncontested elections in each province, and the considerable variations in this respect from province to province. The Central Provinces had the largest number of uncontested elections and the smallest total number of candidates. In all provinces the dearth of candidates was most marked in Muhammadan constituencies, particularly in the towns, and this was specially noticeable in the Bombay Presidency and in the Punjab. It is generally agreed that this must be attributed to a considerable extent to the boycott which was largely advocated and adopted by Muhammadans as a protest against the Turkish peace terms.

(ii) Proportion of Electorates which went to the Polls.

In view of the great variations in conditions from province to province, and even from constituency to constituency, general deductions from provincial averages are apt to be misleading. But certain general conclusions can safely be drawn and are illustrated by the figures.

In the first place, as is shown by the last column of the "summary statements," the percentages of votes polled in contested elections was on the whole remarkably high, and this is demonstrated by an examination of the detailed returns. Not unnaturally, percentages tended to be highest in the "special" constituencies—landholders, universities, commerce, &c.—where voters were less numerous and as a whole of superior education; but high averages were reached also in many "general" territorial constituencies. Thus in Madras City and two Madras districts over 50 per cent. of voters came to the polls, the poor results common in the southern districts of the Madras Presidency being attributed mainly to severe floods at the time of the elections. In the United Provinces one "general" rural constituency polled 66 per cent., 11 over 50 per cent., and 8 between 40 per cent.

and 50 per cent. In Bihar and Orissa rural constituencies percentages of 75, 71, 69 and 58 are examples, and in this province the general average in contested elections was 40 per cent. Small polls were generally commoner in urban than in rural constituencies, particularly in Muhammadan urban constituencies, no doubt chiefly for the reason noticed above in the matter of Muhammadan candidature; and this was specially the case in the Punjab. But in that province the polls varied in rural areas from 22 per cent. to 67 per cent. In the United Provinces even Muhammadan constituencies showed quite high percentages in rural areas, the average figure for this class of constituency being 28 per cent. as compared with 35 per cent. for rural non-Muhammadan constituencies.

In the second place, the general average of rural voters (who form the great majority of the voting population) is considerably higher than was commonly anticipated, having regard to their previous almost total inexperience of elections in general, and to the not inconsiderable distances which had frequently to be traversed between the voter's home and the polling station. In Bihar and Orissa it was noticed particularly that rural voters displayed marked interest in contests where the real interests of the cultivating classes were stirred and an appeal was made by a candidate of their own.

(iii) Miscellaneous Features.

Another noteworthy feature of the results which has belied expectations is the success of the non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency. Although they constitute the great bulk of the population, the non-Brahmins expressed grave apprehensions as to their position under the Reforms Scheme in the belief that they would fail to secure adequate representation on the provincial Council, and that the 28 seats reserved for them to safeguard their interests would prove wholly insufficient. On this Council 74 seats were open to all Hindus, of which non-Brahmins secured no less than 54. Another "special interest" which had also expressed doubts as to its chances of securing adequate representation was that of landholders; but this class, in addition to the seats specially reserved for them, secured a large proportion of the open seats in the Councils of the three provinces in which their apprehensions had been specially expressed—Bengal, the United Provinces and Bihar and Orissa. The extension of the franchise for provincial Councils to ex-soldiers as such, resulted in the addition of over 98,000 electors to the rolls in the Punjab, the province principally affected.

Results of Elections in the Bombay Presidency.

* It is impossible to state exactly the number of voters polled in the case of multiple seat elections. Each voter has two or three votes, and in some cases voters did not record all their votes; a very detailed investigation would be required to determine the exact number of voters who actually voted. But approximately the number of votes received divided by the number of seats gives a figure for number of voters polled, which is slightly less than the correct number.
